

building a better legal profession

--- a national grassroots organization ---

<http://refirmation.wordpress.com>

Law Students Building a Better Legal Profession Releases New D.C. Rankings

Washington, D.C., October 10, 2007 — Law Students Building a Better Legal Profession today will release a series of reports ranking large law firms in Washington, D.C. and other major legal markets on gender composition, diversity, and pro bono participation. The new documents highlight major differences in large law firms and will enable law students to make more informed choices about their entry into the profession. The rankings are available online at <http://refirmation.wordpress.com>.

The national grassroots organization of law students will release its report at a press conference on Wednesday, October 10 at 12:30 pm. The event will occur in the Zenger Room (13th Floor) of the National Press Club in Washington, D.C. Representatives from several law schools, including Harvard, Yale, and Stanford, will be in attendance.

"Most students think big firms are indistinguishable. But they're not," said co-President Andrew Bruck, a 3L at Stanford Law School. "Our report helps students see the differences between their potential employers. There's a tremendous market for law students, and markets rely on information. By providing this information to students, we're helping students make better informed choices about where they want to work after graduation."

Rankings are available for six of the nation's largest legal markets: New York, Washington, D.C., Chicago, Boston, San Francisco, and Los Angeles. Here are brief findings from the D.C. rankings:

- Gender Composition: At all large firms surveyed in D.C.,¹ women are significantly less represented as partners than as associates. At King & Spaulding, which has the highest percentage of female partners in D.C., women make up 30.6% of all partners. At Alston & Bird, which has the lowest percentage of female partners in D.C., women are only 8.2% of all partners.
- Low Diversity Partnership Rates: Of the 46 firms surveyed in D.C., 17 do not have a single Hispanic partner, 17 do not have a single openly LGBT partner, 13 do not have a single Asian-American partner, and 7 do not have a single African-American partner.

¹ The report includes all D.C. offices that employ more than 100 attorneys and which completed a single-office questionnaire in the February 1, 2007 NALP survey. See our document "How We Did This" for more information.

building a better legal profession

--- a national grassroots organization ---

<http://refirmation.wordpress.com>

- Diversity Report Card: Looking at all forms of diversity (gender, race, ethnicity, and sexual orientation), several firms are significantly more diverse than their peers: Nixon Peabody is the only firm to earn a “B+” or higher, while Howrey and WilmerHale are close behind as the only two firms in the earning a “B.” At the bottom of the list are four law firms – Mayer Brown, Baker Botts, Kelley Drye, and Gibson Dunn – that score well below their peers for attracting a diverse workforce.
- Pro Bono Participation: Firms vary in their commitment to pro bono work. At DLA Piper, 89% of partners and 91% of associates contribute to pro bono, while at Patton Boggs, only 2% of partners and 6% of associates volunteer their legal skills in some way. Six firms did not respond to this question, which suggests that some may exhibit lower participation rates.

Full results and a longer explanation of how the rankings were compiled are available online at <http://refirmation.wordpress.com>.

“This pathbreaking research sends a message to America's law firms that is loud and clear: the best law students want to work at the firms where they have a fair chance at promotion, and where it is possible to work hard and enjoy a family life,” said Michele Landis Dauber, Professor of Law at Stanford. “It's about time students collected this kind of basic information about law firms and began to vote with their feet.”

“This is an extraordinarily impressive effort to shine much needed light on law firms' commitment to diversity, not just in principle but in practice,” said Deborah L. Rhode, McFarland Professor of Law and Director of the Center on Ethics, Stanford University and Former Chair, ABA Commission on Women in the Profession. “This should be the starting point of a constructive conversation between firms, law schools, law students, and bar organizations about how to create a just and equitable professional culture.”

“Firms have to do more than compete on salary alone. Whether the metric is gender equity, billable hour expectations, or attrition rates, lawyers will be attracted to high-performing firms, and avoid firms unresponsive to their priorities,” said Law Students Building a Better Legal Profession co-Founder Andrew Canter. “We look forward to distributing these rankings to our members and law students across the country.”

Additional praise for the report can be found on Page 4 of this press release.

About Law Students Building a Better Legal Profession

Law Students Building a Better Legal Profession is a national grassroots organization made up of law students from across the country. Its 150+ members are committed to a building a better legal profession

--- a national grassroots organization ---

<http://refirmation.wordpress.com>

legal profession devoted to effective and efficient client service, to lawyers as people, and to the roots of our profession in service. The organization encourages law students to use their market power to support law firms taking concrete steps toward a more sustainable legal profession. It has been featured in the Wall Street Journal, National Law Journal, Legal Times, and the San Francisco Daily Journal, among other publications.

Media Contacts:

Andrew Bruck
Co-President
973.769.6912
bruck@stanford.edu

Andrew Canter
Co-Founder
202.251.1468
canter@stanford.edu

Michele Landis Dauber, J.D./Ph.D.
Professor of Law, Stanford Law School
650-521-6005
MLDauber@law.stanford.edu

building a better legal profession

--- a national grassroots organization ---

<http://refirmation.wordpress.com>

Praise for Building a Better Legal Profession

“Building a Better Legal Profession has provided us with a resource that has great promise. By comparing the largest law firms in the top legal markets, the students have put a spotlight on the key issues of demographic diversity, pro bono participation and hours billed, which are such important indicators of the heart and soul of a firm. It is particularly noteworthy that these law students are showing initiative and demonstrating a commitment to improving the profession and career options for themselves and for all those who will come after them. These enterprising law students have an enormous potential to be a force for good and for positive change – now and throughout their careers. I commend them for their dedication and hard work.”

-- Marcia D. Greenberger, Co-President, National Women’s Law Center

“This report confirms that the legal profession has a long way to go in terms of becoming more diverse and fully reflective of our society. We hope that this report can also serve as a springboard for devising strategies that increase minority representation in law firms.”

-- L. Jared Boyd, National Attorney General, National Black Law Students Association

“We are proud to earn this recognition from Law Students Building a Better Legal Profession. A commitment to workplace diversity is essential in attracting and retaining exceptional attorneys out of law school and to ensuring the success of law firms. It will continue to be a top priority at Orrick.”

-- Ralph Baxter, chairman and CEO of Orrick, which ranked highly in overall diversity in the New York market.

“These reports are extremely important. Even the best intentioned law firms can have gaps between policy and actual practice and objective numbers can help point out those gaps. Law firms as well as law students will benefit from better information that is widely available.”

-- Cynthia Thomas Calvert, Co-Director, Project for Attorney Retention

“Law students are in a powerful position to positively influence the legal profession by making educated choices early in their careers about the kinds of law firms for which they want to work. Too often, students don’t have the information to really evaluate what a firm prioritizes in hiring and retaining lawyers. This program has the potential to remedy that problem and to give law students the tools to begin their careers in environments where they will be welcome and encouraged while getting to do important, challenging work.”

-- Kate Reilly, Vice President, Harvard Women's Law Association. Ms. Reilly can be reached at kreilly \(at\) law.harvard.edu or 973-886-6669.